Great CEOs are people who put great teams together. Scott Kriens at Juniper is one of the best CEOs Khosla has ever worked with, as well as Bill Campbell. There isn't always one definition of a CEO, Khosla notes, each situation requires a different kind of leader, and each stage of a company has different needs for that leader.

To your question, great CEOs are people who put great names together.. So Scott Grant at Juniper is one of the best CEOs I've worked with.. A person who is not a CEO today, but has been and probably the best CEO coach I know is Bill Campbell, who used to be CEO of Intuit Inc.. He has spoken here.. Yeah.. And works with us in a lot of companies.. So that's a couple of examples.. There are plenty of others and I would say that there's not always one definition.. Each situation requires a different kind of CEO and it's perfectly OK because that's the way it is.. Also, at every stage of a company what you need changes..

One just has to acknowledge that and look at that..
