After sitting down with the team and spending a lot of time really looking at the new, this space, I decided to join as the CEO and came in September of last year.. So I've been on-board for little over a year now.. The company as mentioned is called SpikeSource.. What makes, what we do interesting is we're solving a real problem.. So that was one of the lessons also I learned along the way, there's just got to be pain.. If you're building something, either there's got to be an enormous untapped opportunity or else you're addressing some pain.. In this case the pain is managing open source components.. The complexity of the interoperability of open source components if you're using open source in a production environment...
